FLAT HULL IS USED

For balf an hour yesterday afternoon "Gyro Columba," the new hydroplane of the Washington Aeroplane Company, akipped from the surface of the Potomac River, between the Capital City Yacht Club and the War College, into the air and back into the water again, much to the entertainment of a knot of people that had congregated on the wharf to watch the flight.

The start was to have been made at 1 o'clock, but as the 'plane was being shoved off the barge a squally wind sprang up that continued on and off for the better part of the afternoon and prevented M. E. Reid, the aviator of Philadelphia, from taking to the water. The new plane is the result of the work of several months, and her builders now express satisfaction at her work. Furing the course of her development one new principle of hydroplane construction has been discovered, but the start of the several months, and her builders now express satisfaction at her work. Furing the course of her development one new principle of hydroplane construction has been discovered, the river and steadfastily refused to take the air. The hull was replaced to take the air. The hull was replaced with one whose bottom is flat and whose lines are angular, and now she makes a speed of sixty miles in the water and sixty-five in the air, besides taking the air like a bird. Yesterday Aviator Reid carried a passenger for several spins up and down the river without difficulty. One of the spectacular stunts of the plane is the way she rebounds often the first of the water after a flight. The boat bounds often the surface of the water after a flight. The boat bounds often to the water permissently for some little time after the first contact.
